

INTRODUCTION

In 1982 I worked at the faculty of Social Sciences of the University of Amsterdam (in the Netherlands) as a methodologist. My work consisted of reviewing statistical software packages that were used at the university to analyse data. After a year I left the university because working as a methodologist/statistician wasn't fulfilling for me. I was more a man of ideas and concepts than a technician. My interest in the sciences never faded though and I kept reading about research, developments and new concepts in science. But of course, having studied psychology, I had more interest in the social sciences than in the other sciences.

I started this web log because I like to write about science and I am very interested in what other people think about different subjects like knowledge, the foundations of science, mathematical concepts, language, mankind and human interaction.
